Synopsis:

With the higher demand on living standard and stringent environmental requirement for sustainable development, taking the approach to build the relevant facilities underground seems inevitable for the next decade. The development of building the environmental facilities underground requires technologies innovation and the acceptability by the public and relevant authorities concerned. Therefore, to protect the environment, contribute to conserving natural resources and combat climate change, should all environmental professional parties take a big step to meet the needs of future generations?

The Speaker:

Dr Xiaohua Chen is an engineering-minded leader with over 20 years experience in the process and design works for the water and wastewater treatment plants. He currently directs a team of process and design engineers to execute the water and wastewater treatment projects for China and Asia. He has provided technology solutions to many large scale water and wastewater projects across a variety of applications in China, Singapore, Vietnam, Thailand, Malaysia & India. He has conducted over 20 technical seminars in water & wastewater process design & applications in China for the last 5 years. Originating from China, He holds a BS degree from University of Tianjin, Master Degree from Ecole Nationale des Ponts et Chaussees University Paris and a Doctor's Degree in water treatment (Hydrology) from University of Paris VI.
